What is it like to be a human in a biodiversity hotspot? Amani Nature Reserve, a protected mountain forest in Tanzania, is home to more than 30,000 people. In this talk, Pouchet will discuss her ethnographic research in the villages that surround this important natural resource, and how Amani’s residents navigate the dynamics of global environmental attention, economic marginalization, and a changing climate in their everyday lives.

This event is sponsored by the African Studies Program and International Programs.

For more information, please visit: international.uiowa.edu/academic/african-studies