In the mid-1980s, Professor Fuller was a Fulbright scholar in Venezuela, where he structured a masters program in economics for Universidad de los Andes. While there, he also consulted with local transportation officials to explore the creation of an urban transit system. Little did he know at the time that this cross-cultural experience would fundamentally change his worldview and impact the rest of his life.